“Civil War Corps Command:
A Study in Leadership”

BY BRUCE ALLARDICE

The American Civil War was the great battleground upon which the Regular Army of the United States came of age. For the first time, massive deployment of large armies and the logistical and intelligence networks necessary to support them were put into effect. The nature of combat and command in the Civil War necessitated the reorganization of the armies. Brigades and Divisions, previously the largest organizational bodies were replaced by the introduction of army corps for the first time. The solution to the problem was a problem in itself. No officers of the United States Army had ever commanded anything of the size and complexity of an army corps. While it is true that the army gained much practical experience in the Mexican War, that conflict was as nothing in its scope and scale and in the responsibilities it taught to senior commanders, compared to the latter conflict. The largest army in the Mexican War would have been but a weak army corps in the Civil War that followed.

A number of generals rose to command army corps in the Civil War. For some the job was too complex, for others, a steppingstone to army command. On November 12th Rob Girardi will address both the nature of corps command and examine how a number of generals rose—or failed to rise—to the demands of the job.

U.S. Prisoner Artifacts Found At Georgia Site; Camp Lawton Explored

by Scott C. Boyd from October Civil War News

Millen, Ga- The site of Camp Lawton, a Union soldier prisoner-of-war camp near Millen, is "pristine," according to East Georgia College Professor Emeritus of History Dr. John K. Derden. On August 18th, the unexpected discovery of numerous artifacts from the camp was announced by Georgia Southern University and the two other major organizations involved.

The Georgia Department of Natural Resources (DNR) operates Magnolia Springs State Park, where the majority of Camp Lawton's remains are. The rest are in the adjacent Bo Ginn National Fish Hatchery which the U.S. Fish and Wildlife Service administers. The artifacts were found on this site. The DNR commissioned the archeological work by Georgia Southern University which led to the discoveries.

The team is led by Georgia Southern graduate student J. Kevin Chapman. His faculty mentor, Professor of Anthropology Dr. Sue M. Moore, supervises Chapman and five other graduate students. Derden, who is writing a book about Camp Lawton, said he was "adopted as the project historian" when he spoke with Chapman, a former student of his, about their mutual interest in the site.

Magnolia Springs State Park has long displayed informational signs about Camp Lawton being there. Earthworks from the fortifications that overlooked the 42-acre wooden prison stockade remain visible. The stockade disappeared over time.

Professor Moore says the current archeological effort was initiated in the spring of 2009 when DNR Commissioner Chris Clark asked her to conduct a survey of Camp Lawton. When Kevin Chapman told Moore he wanted to return to Georgia Southern for a master's degree in anthropology, he recalls she said, "Great. I've got just the project you." She describes a little community service project at the park and hatchery. "There won't be a whole lot to it because there's not a whole lot there." The work began in December 2009. "We originally thought we would find features, things like the stockade walls and maybe the footing for the brick ovens, but we did not expect to find artifacts," Moore said. "We had pretty much assumed those were already gone. It turned out when we excavated they were not, in fact, gone." They were found in the spring on the hatchery side of the camp.

Chapman wrote on the project web site: "We began to retrieve an amazing collection of artifacts proving that the site was of unexpected importance. The artifacts are not only visually impressive, but they also tell an incredible story individually and as a whole." He estimates they have found 350 artifacts so far. Some of them will go on display at the Georgia Southern University Museum October 10th. A clay tobacco pipe with an improvised lead bowl is Chapman's favorite so far. "The idea of a lead bowl or a pipe is kind of baffling until you think that's probably the only alternative that soldier had." A tourniquet buckle is one of Moore's favorite finds, she said, "because it tells you a little about things that are going on there, whether it's the medical care or whether it's that somebody maybe had a tourniquet buckle that they reused to hold something else, we don't know yet." She said it has preserved cloth in it. "That's a real rare thing for us to be able to find."

As far as Confederate prisons go, Camp Lawton was one-of-a-kind, according to Chapman. He said the Confederacy had 36 major prisons, 18 of which had stockades. Camp Lawton is the only prison stockade with its remains intact, he said. The rest have been looted or ploughed over. The camp's 42-acre stockade was also the largest, exceeding the 26.5 acres at Camp Sumter at Andersonville, Ga. For information about the camp go to www.georgiasouthern.edu/camplawton and www.fws.gov/camplawtonsite.

Good News!—Our CWRTs preservation donations have helped the Johnson Island Civil War Prison site preserve 17 acres which include most of the prison depot. The Chicago CWRT will be listed on a bronze plaque as a major contributor to the site preservation. Visit the Johnson Island website for more information.

October Meeting

BY MARK MATRANGA

Earl Hess addressed 51 members and guests at the 694th meeting of the Chicago Civil War Round Table on October 8, 2010, on the subject of "Soldier Life in the Trenches at Petersburg." During the 292-day siege of Petersburg, the Army of Northern Virginia and its counterpart Army of the Potomac developed extensive and sophisticated systems of field fortifications. Measured by linear feet of parapets, these earthworks stretched 127.4 miles and covered Petersburg and the south and east approaches to Richmond, as well as the Bermuda Hundred between the Appomattox and James Rivers. Thirty-five miles of entrenchments lay south of the Appomattox, and included 41 union forts and numerous confederate redoubts.

The trenches at Petersburg were not only longer, but deeper and with thicker parapets and more massive fields of obstruction than other entrenchments in the war. Also, the trenches at Petersburg were protected by 'torpedo belts' - 2,266 yards of Confederate earthworks north of the James were fronted by a thick belt of mines.

Some 100,000 Union and Confederate troops occupied the trenches around Petersburg. The armies used wood for fuel as well as for constructing fortifications and clearing fields of fire between lines. This contributed to ecological change: before the campaign, the area was 50% forested; after, only 22%. Forty four hundred acres of forest were lost in eleven months.

As early as August 1864, the deleterious effects of trench life were recorded by the Inspector General of Hagood's South Carolina brigade, who wrote that "vermin abounded" and that mens' "digestive organs became impaired by the rations that were issued and the manner in which they were prepared. Diarrhea and dysentery were universal." Extremities swelled due to staying in deep trenches, until the men could no longer wear their shoes. The "filth of their persons from the scarcity of water is almost unbearable."

Thomas Jackson Strayhorn of the 27th North Carolina was repelled by the thought of being in "those dirty ditches....they are so dirty and hot you can get no air at all scarcely." Trench life caused L.S. Rogers of the 56th North Carolina to feel as if he were imprisoned. "My mind is so confused," he wrote. Exposure to constant sniping on picket lines exacerbated stress, although truces broke the monotony.

Deforestation also contributed to ill health. Without natural cover, enormous clouds of sand and clay dust, 'fine and sticky,' arose whenever someone walked. "You see nothing but dust at Petersburg. You smell dust, you eat dust, you drink dust. Your clothes, your blanket, your food, your drink, are all permeated with dust," wrote the chaplain of the 102nd Pennsylvania. Rainstorms turned the dust into soupy mud and the trenches into rivers. Bombproofs provided protection but were damp and muddy and infested with rats. Poor sanitation habits made the entrenchments open cesspools and produced fields of human waste, "nuisances," behind the lines.

In dry weather, dust caked on soldiers' bodies and they were beset swarms of flies. Combined with a shortage of soap, the itching this caused affected health and welfare. "The great want of cleanliness is now producing sickness among the men in the trenches," Lee wrote Davis in August 1864, "and must affect their self-respect and their morale." And so it did: 5,928 Confederate soldiers deserted in the period from January through the end of March, 1865. Overall approximate casualties were 42,000, Union, and 28,000, Confederate.

Calling Petersburg a siege is a misnomer, said Hess. Contrary to popular conception, it did not foreshadow the static warfare of WWI. Rather, it was an extended component of a 165-mile mobile offensive which took place over the year from the Wilderness to Appomattox. Petersburg was never completely cut off from the outside and Grant constantly extended his lines and attempted to maneuver Lee out of his. This he ultimately did on April 3, 1865.

Camp Douglas Preservation

A new effort to preserve the Camp Douglas site in Bronzeville is quickly building momentum. The Camp Douglas Restoration Foundation has been formed to establish a permanent memorial as well as interpretive and educational facilities. The Foundation has enlisted many of Bronzeville's community groups, and all are participating and supporting the effort, as are the Chicago History Museum and the DuSable Museum. Funding for an archaeological dig has also been approved by Loyola University for summer 2011. Volunteers are needed for fund raising, community outreach, gallery design, developing programs, and research. To learn more or to sign on to help, visit www.campdouglas.org.
